Wrecked Promises of Bright Lives ... An Illustration of the Uncertainties and Disappointments of Aspiration-A Scene

The death of young William Sprague recalls the few times I have seen memfamily, says "Shadows," writing from Washington to the Louisville Courier Journal. At the very outset of the war, soon after the first Bull Run battle, I was at the headquarters of a division camped near Washington. Coming together or accidentally meeting there, I saw President Lincoln and General Sprague on a visit to the Division Commander. Governor Sprague had just been made a brigadier general, and be was probably one of the youngest gen erals in the army. Governor, general, young, rich, at the head of a great manufacturing establishment and married to the famous Miss Kate Chase, no one seemed to have the prespect of a brighter life. He was in high spirits and bore his honors easily
I remember noticing at the time that the President looked at him with a of satisfaction-a regard that seemed to say he wished that he had more of these young, rich and ambi-tious young men under him. Miss Kate thuse was a very handsome woman entirely self-possessed and ac-complished in social ways, though somewhat out of the usual tos. She was very stylish in atreet dress and was considered a great beauty in even-ing costume. He did not turn out to be much of a soldier, and as events further the ability he was supposed to possess. His fortune and reputation went, and her life became clouded.

The story of their lives is a wooful commentary on bright prospects and fair promises. Last May I saw the mother and the son, who is just dead, sitting together in court in Washington, istenening to a use in which they were interested concerning the Sprague properties. They did not seem to be on mother and son, though several times gentle society. As to his expression, I would say that he had rather a surly aspect, and seemed to be easily irritated. They sat in court all day listening to the arguments.

Hack of and almost above the mother's head was the marble bust of Chief Justice Chase. The picture all this made was an illustration of the uncertalaties and disappointments of aspira-tion. No more ambitious man fived than Chief Justice Chase, but the object of his ambition, the Presidency, never reached him. Miss Kate Chase had hoped to preside in the White House as the daughter of the President, and failing that to preside over the estab-lishment and destiny of one of the rickest and politically successful young

WHY SENATOR STANFORD AND HUNT-INGDON PARTED COMPANY.

A Family Quarrel and Radical Differences Upon Pacific Coast Politics Make the Break-A Woman

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Oct 16,-What are the inside facts in the Hunt-Ingdon - Stanford quarrel?" This question has been on a thousand tongues since Mr. Huntingdon succeeded Stanford as president of the Southern California system. It is said that a woman is the original cause, but there is no scandal, simply a family quarrel. Mr. Huntingdon's first wife was a Stanford. All were great friends for twenty-seven years. Mr. Huntingdon and Mr. Stanford were building up and controlling the vast railway system now dominating the Pacific coast.

Mrs. Huntingdon died. Mr. Huntingdon married again. It is said that his second wife was not cordially received by the Stanfords. Mr. Huntingdon, a bold, outspoken. imperuous man, resented it, and after twenty-Several days ago Miss Cammack left seven years of brotherly association home on a visit to a lady friend in with Mr. Stanford, Mr. Huntingdon secured the presidency of the vast corporation, and with it 7,500 miles of road, representing $150,000,000 of cap-

I am not opposed to legitimate politics, but there should be no politics in our business. I have nothing personal against Mr. Stanford. He has many good points, but he has no right to use the company's property for his own political ends. I will stay in these offices 365 days a year if necessary to keep out politics. Things have reached such a pass in San Francisco that if a man runs for constable he thinks it neces-Instructions and power."
